

I do not believe that jailbreaking should be ruled illegal. It does not interfere with the DMCA's laws, and therefore it is a legal process. I also believe that jailbreaking is completely legal because once we buy Apple's device, it becomes ours, and we are free to do whatever we want to it. If we want to be able to have five icons on our dock, then let us have five icons on our dock. If we want to be able to enable multitasking on an unsupported device, then let us enable multitasking on an unsupported device. If we want to have an alternate notification system, then let us have an alternate notification system!! I have said many times before, that if I can't jailbreak, then I won't buy Apple products, because it is not my device anymore. It is owned by Apple, and if they don't want something to happen to it, then they are going to do everything in their power to not let that happen. I don't want someone limiting my user experience on a great device that I paid good money for. I will say that some of the things you do with jailbreaking are illegal, such as using Installous to download cracked apps, but that's the user's choice. If they get caught pirating, then so be it. That's not my choice that they pirated apps. Just because one person does something bad, doesn't mean that a whole group of people should get punished for it. I rest my case.

Tyler Walker

Memory Lane Productions | CEO

twalker1998@gmail.com

<http://memorylnproductions.com>