

Accessible books comments: I am not particularly computer savvy but can manage this and other e mails. I have scanned print books with an OCR scanner but that is a waste of my valuable time. If I can afford to buy a book, I should be allowed to read it. I should be allowed to read it as the author intended, not all jumbled up

Up

Jumlbd

%&(p

the way they are after I have scanned them. I should be able to get word files or recorded text if I have the money to purchase such. In this age, getting the printed word in electronic format should be a given. Blind people are not constitutional step children. We too have the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. We are not asking for free access, only the right to read that you take for granted. As for the concern that our copies might fall into the hands of those unwilling to pay the authors for their hard work, I don't think it will be a significant number as to drive them to poverty. We are one percent of one percent of the population. As for giving our copies to sighted readers, first I have found sighted folks uninterested in recorded materials and in reading from a computer as I do. Second, Sighted people currently leave and pass printed books freely among each other without worrying about copyright. This hasn't hurt the authors either. When a blind person who can afford your book is not allowed to read your book, it is discrimination. You might as well put whites only on your bathroom door.