

I support the jailbreaking exemption for all consumer devices - smartphones, tablets, video game consoles, etc. We consumers buy these devices with our hard earned cash and they should be ours to do what we please with them.

I'm a hobbyist who works professionally in the Information Security field. I like being able to make my phone/tablet more secure - as an example I have a jailbroken utility that warns me the device is about to load a PDF instead of just doing it automatically. This way if I'm on a sketchy site I can deny the PDF load that I did not explicitly request.

I jailbreak my devices in order to tweak them to work as I wish them to work. Lots of options aren't supported by the manufacturer and I understand why as they are limited to the number of features they can implement for a given code cycle. Jailbroken utilities give me the power to add the missing features I wish my phone/tablet had (at my own risk).
