

I support the "Jailbreak" exemptions for both smartphones/tablets and video game consoles. There are programs and software that I could not run without a jailbreak. These programs are essential and useful for my business in the IT field. In addition, I am a developer and would not have access to the tools I need without a proper jailbreak. I also like to customize my device. It is, after all, MINE, I should be able to do whatever I wish with it, as long as it does not hurt others or break some other law. That is the essence of what makes this law ridiculous in the first place. It is our device, WE SHOULD NOT HAVE TO WRITE IN AND REQUEST AN "EXEMPTION" to do what we wish with it.

Personally I need to jailbreak my iPhone and my tablet, but I support the jailbreak exemption for video game consoles as well. It is their device, as long as they don't break the law with it (like piracy laws), they should be able to do whatever they wish. Hobbyists and developers need it.

The term "jailbreak" seems to bring up negative connotations, but it has nothing to do with crime or punishment. These companies run the devices in a "jailed" environment, that we need to "break" them out of.

Thank you
