

The US Copyright office should be lowering fees, rather than raising them, to encourage people to register their copyrights. Of course, this will have little effect on large companies, but the vast majority of creatives registering copyright are small business owners, like me, that cannot easily absorb the additional fees. This feels like another case of a more automated process that now costs more, and by raising the fees, it will discourage registration rather than encouraging it.