

PRIVACY: Copyright Public Records

When you register a copyright claim with the Copyright Office, you create a public record of your claim. All information you provide on your copyright application will be available to the public, and some of it will be on the Internet.

Who may see my copyright registration records?

Anyone. The Copyright Office is required by law to make copyright registrations available for public inspection, including any personal information that is in an application for registration. Once a registration is completed and a claim has been cataloged, everything in it, including all personal information, is available for public inspection. Individuals have always been able to come to the Copyright Office to inspect its public records. Some personally identifying information in post-1978 registration records is also available on the Copyright Office's website. Personally identifying information includes all names and addresses and year of birth, if provided.

Will my registration records help provide contact information for someone interested in using my work?

Yes. Records of copyright registrations and recorded documents having to do with copyright can be used by the public to identify the author(s) and copyright owner(s) of a work. The public record may also provide information about an owner's agent who can be contacted to license the registered work and to grant permission to use it.

Can I remove information that I don't want publicized?

No. When you register a claim to copyright with the Copyright Office, you create a public record of your claim. Information cannot be removed from the public record once it has been submitted in an application for registration. All information you provide will be available to the public, and some of it will be on the Internet. You may wish to consider whether you want to include on your application a birth date, nickname, alias, or any other optional detail that you consider to be sensitive.

The screenshot shows the Copyright.gov website. At the top, the logo for Copyright.gov is displayed, along with the text "UNITED STATES COPYRIGHT OFFICE" and "A Department of the Library of Congress". Below the logo is a navigation menu with links for "ABOUT US", "NEWS", "LAW AND POLICY", "PUBLICATIONS", and "CONTACT US", followed by a search bar labeled "Search Copyright.gov".

The main content area features a heading "Hearing: Copyright Remedies" and a sub-heading "The Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property and the Internet of the U.S. House of Representatives' Committee on the Judiciary conducted a hearing on 'Copyright Remedies' on July 24, 2014." Below this is a "Read More" button.

Below the hearing announcement is a section titled "HOW DO I...?" with four sub-sections, each with a representative image and a link:

- Register a Copyright (image of a person at a computer)
- Record a Document (image of a document)
- Search Records (image of a person looking at a document)
- Learn about Statutory Licensing (image of a document)

At the bottom of the page, there are three columns of links:

- Frequently Asked Questions: Why should I register my work? How long does copyright protection last? More FAQs
- Other Services: Mandatory Deposit, Notice of Restored Copyrights, Request a Search Estimate
- Tutorials: Electronic Copyright Office, Copyright Search, Catalog of Copyright Entries

How can I prevent personal information from being placed on the Copyright Office website?

All information provided on the application for registration will become a permanent part of the public record of the Copyright Office, and some of that information will be available online through the Office's website, including the name and address of the copyright claimant.

Information provided in the rights and permissions section of the application will also be made available online, but providing rights and permissions information is optional. Applicants who want to include rights and permissions information but do not want to provide personal details can use third-party agents, post office boxes, or designated email accounts.

If someone else submits an application on your behalf, it is still your responsibility to ensure that information that you want to keep out of the public record is omitted. Information provided in an application becomes part of the public record without regard to whether you or your authorized agent prepared and submitted the application, and the Office cannot alter or remove information at your request. In certain cases, it may be permissible to register a claim in a work either anonymously or pseudonymously (under a fictitious name).

Other categories of information in copyright applications that may be made available online include the following: type of work, registration number, title of the work, author, authorship, preexisting material, date of creation, and date of publication.

Why is my copyright registration information now appearing on search engines such as Google?

Because your copyright registration is a public record, others can access it and may create alternative means to make the information in it more widely available. The Copyright Office is not responsible for the form or the substance of third-party redistribution of Copyright Office records.
